What is the Housing Element Update?

The City of Sausalito is preparing an update of its Housing Element in accordance with State law. The State requires that the City address a Regional Housing Needs Allocation (RHNA), which establishes the number of new housing units needed by various income groups (from very low to above moderate income) in each California jurisdiction. The RHNA for the City of Sausalito was established at 372 units for the two planning periods of 1999-2006 and 2007-2014. The Housing Element describes various programs the City will continue or establish to address its regional housing need. Cities are not required to actually build the housing—rather, they must demonstrate to the State that the opportunity to build the housing has been created.

In order to address the RHNA, the City is required to identify specific sites that potentially could be available for housing which would be affordable for a variety of income levels from very low income to above moderate income. The City is considering residentially zoned properties, either vacant or able to accommodate additional units. The City is also reviewing sites, both residential and non-residential, that might be suitable to accommodate residential development at an increased density.

The vacant property along Woodward Avenue has been identified as a site with potential for rezoning to allow residential development at an increased density. The site was chosen due to its size, current use and potential for future residential development. Although identified as a potential housing site, it is important to emphasize that no property owner would be obligated to develop his or her property for such purpose as part of any adopted Housing Element.
